6.3 ELA Pathway

*Task, Purpose and Audience

*When you write you have to think about.....

*WHO is your audience?

AND

*WHAT is your purpose?

Who might be your audience?

Once upon a time in a town called Zippington, Queen Tumbledot lived with a colony of Spotsters.

Let's put extra time into studying our Study Island this week. If we all get 100 it would make Mrs. Dupes very happy and proud of us. Just picture the look on her face if we all got 100!

Wear these awesome sneakers!! They will make you popular with your friends AND make you go FASSSSTTTTT!!!

90% of all volcanic activity occurs in the Earth's oceans! We don't see, hear, or feel it. That is in sharp contrast to volcanoes that erupt and do so much damage

It is important for you to be able to write for many different purposes, or reasons. Some different purposes for writing are listed below.

- Describe: Some writing describes something or how to do something. For example, the directions that come with a new toy have the purpose of describing how to put the toy together.
- Inform: Some writing has the purpose of informing. Most news articles in the newspaper are written to inform. A biography (a book written about the life of a person) usually has the purpose of informing the reader about the person's life.
- Persuade: Some writing is written for the purpose of persuasion. A good example of persuasive writing is the writing found in advertisements. Advertisements are designed to persuade you to buy a certain product. Speeches by politicians are also examples of persuasive writing.
- Narrate: Narration has the purpose of telling a story. The narrator relates a series of events.
- Entertain: Some writing has the purpose of entertaining. The comic strips in the newspaper are there to entertain the readers with humor. A mystery novel and a fairy tale are also good examples of writing that have the purpose of entertaining.

Let's try!
